“Starting today, we must pick ourselves up, dust ourselves off, and begin again the work of remaking America.”
 President Barack Obama, inaugural address, 20th January 2009.

There is perhaps nowhere in America more in need of renewal than Detroit.

A town that became famous for cars and music is now blighted by poverty and urban decay.

After Henry Ford built the first car production line there in 1913, it became the centre of the global automobile industry. Ford, General Motors, Chrysler and a host of other contenders now long defunct made Detroit a wealthy and prestigious town.

Detroit put the country, and much of the world, on wheels.

The tide began to turn with the recession of 1958.

Following the devastating riots of 1967, racial tensions and fear of crime spurred the ‘white flight’, as thousands of white middle-class families fled the city centre for the suburbs. By the end of the century, the population had halved.

The slow strangulation of US automobile manufacturing by increased foreign competition combined with a failed model policy and high labour costs killed many of the jobs in the area, helping to make Detroit the country’s poorest big city.

Cuba 50 th anniversary of revolution Photo: Jerome Sessini

On January 8th 1959, Fidel Castro comes into free Havana triumphing. He ends seven years of Batista's despotic regime. At the time, Fidel is acclaimed by thousands of Cubans who greet their liberator.

Fifty years of Castrism later, the Cuban people don't have any more desire to celebrate anything.

Cubans are bloodless, depressed by the hard conditions of daily life : The monthly salary of most of the Cubans is about 13 euros.

Every day becomes a « lucha », a fight to provide the basics needs.

For the 50th anniversary of the Revolution day, Cubans were invited by government to remain at home to watch the Raul Castro speech on TV.
 A speech austere and widely turned toward the past, without future prospect and hope.

« At least Fidel knew to keep the people hoping, during the 50 years I believed that better days were coming up each following

Riot in Colombia

Santander de Quilichao, October 2008 - Cauca valley

In Colombia as well as Bolivia there is a similar movement of freedom.

The native people are on the rise and start demanding their human rights.

Bolivia has just acknowledged the native people by granting them extended rights to land and self determination.

But in Colombia the demonstrations and clashes between native peoples Nasa ethnic group and government troops continue.

In Fabio Cutticas story we see the explosive situation were armed native communities led by the Nasa ethnic group start riots, block roads and fight for their rights.
