The other Olympics Tom Pilston

Twic county has suffered the worst excesses of conflict. Located on the border between north and south Sudan, for much of the last 25 years it was at the epicentre of a brutal civil war. Massacres of civilians were frequent, while women and children were abducted for use as slaves.

It was against this background that the local relief agency Sudan Production Aid (Supraid) founded the Twic Olympics. This annual sporting festival pits the county's six payams (districts) against each other for sporting glory - but more importantly brings them together in a spirit of peace and friendship.

On a dusty, hard mud field cleared from the bush, men and women compete in a range of sports including football, distance running, volleyball and tug o' war.

War was still raging when the Twic Olympics began in 2000. It was another five years before the northern government and the southern rebels reached a peace agreement, allowing those displaced by war to return home.

The games offer a chance for people - and youths especially - returning after the war to integrate back into their communities by being part of a sporting team. As one of the participants says, "the Twic Olympics challenges everyone who thinks nothing good can happen in Sudan."

Tanzania's albinos are stalked by cancer, stigmatisation and murder.

Because they have no retinal pigment, albinos are sensible to the sun. The most sun-exposed parts of the body gets sunburn, blisters and photo-ageing of the skin, and can ultimately cause skin cancer. Life expectancy is as low as 30.

Many people across Africa believe albinos have magical powers. In 2007 there was a wave of albino killings in Tanzania. At least 25 albinos, including children, were killed in an 18 month period in the Northern Lake Victoria region alone. They were victims of a growing criminal trade in albino body parts and blood, which are used as ingredients in potions prepared by witch doctors. Some fishermen, thinks they will catch more fish by sewing albino hair into their nets.

The Tanzanian government is making efforts to ensure that no more killings occur. To end the stigmatisation, President Jakaya Kikwete has announced a crackdown on traditional healers. He also nominated the first albino Member of Parliament.

Samuel Mluge, the General Secretary of the Tanzanian Albino Society says he feels like he is being hunted. He believes that the problems stem from a lack of education about albinism. "It's high time to teach the public that albinism is not a curse but a medical condition that can be managed."
